

Carnegie, Terrestrial Magnetism, and Exoplanetary Habitability

Eric Isaac

Abstract

"More than a century ago, Carnegie researchers built a non-magnetic wooden ship to serve as a seagoing observatory, to study and chart Earth's magnetism. Now our scientists are building on those early investigations to understand the role that magnetic fields might play in planetary habitability, as part of a broader inquiry into the fundamental characteristics necessary to the potential development of life".